The effort that some women make to The effort that some women make to keep up appearances wears them to skin and bone, and what is their reward? A significant shrug from those who see through their pretenses and the toleration of those who are quite willing to accept the struggle they make to be something they are not, but are quite well aware all the time of the sham and veneer that they try to palm off as the real thing. How much happier would these ambitious feminines be if they just put aside the chicanery of social effort and appeared in their plain and natural guise, making the chicanery of social effort and appeared in their plain and natural guise, making no pretense above their means and securing thereby a mental and bodily comfort heretofore unknown. If this resolution were arrived at and lived up to we would see no more of the woman with on. servant endeavoring to impress the world with the idea that she has at least three, and fretting the life out of the poor girl by rushing her into cap and apron to appear at the door when she is elhow deep in the washday suds, or insisting upon her removing her friends wraps and shoes when the odor of burning meat proclaims the fact odor of burning meat proclaims the fact that her place is in the kitchen, not in the odor of burning meat proclaims the fact that her place is in the kitchen, not in the boudoir.

Then, again, in the matter of dress we would be relieved from hearing the endless tale of exorbitant dressmakers bills and treated to the sight of silk-lined froaks covering cotton stockings and the plainest of lingerle. A healthier condition would prevail when madame provided more than a cracker and a cup of tea for her own luncheon and terrapin and champagne for her guests when she wished to duly impress them. When women are once again their own natural selves happiness will have some chance of existence, and strange as it may sound, those whom they are now making such frantic efforts to imbue with an idea of their own importance will think a hundred times more of them for honesty and enjoy their society a hundred times more when they know that the entertainment offered them, while meager, perhaps, is not costing the hostess a sleepless night worrying over how it is to be paid for.

A most enjoyable birthday dinner and surprise party was given Thursday evening, September 21, by Mrs. King, of Walrond avenue, in honor of her husband, Captain D. C. King, who made his first bow to the world on the 21st day of September, 1839. The evening was spent in listening to Captain King's recital of the many interesting happenings in a life of three score years. A delightful dinner was served at 7:30, and an after dinner speech was delivered by Rev. Mr. Harry King. The speech was reminiscent, reviewing the life and character of the speaker's father, paying tribute to the sterling manhood of the captain in private life, as well as in defense of that flag which was then tendered to Captain King as a gift from the family.

Those present were: Captain and Mrs. D. C. King, Rev. Mr. and Mrs. Harry King, Mrs. Nettle Shaw, Mr. Glenn King, Mr. Rernest Shaw, Mrs. Susan Newgent, Mr. and Mrs. B. S. Deatherage, Mr. and Mrs. S. B. Stokely. A most enjoyable birthday dinner and
